

The article discusses the use of suppressed conductivity and mass spectrometry procedures in determining the presence of trace level bromate and bromide in drinking water. According to researches, bromate in drinking water is commonly formed during ozonization of bromide containing waters for disinfection purposes.